If it is the primary purpose of you taxpayers to support and finance the imperial plans of

The American sees no reason why this plan could not be worked out with profit on a large street railway like the Bay State with its lines extending through many populous cities and its cars reaching into scores of towns. One of the great and difficult problems of government operation of the national railways is the problem of balancing useful centralization with useful decentralization. The genius of our American institutions lies in our insistence upon the maximum of local autonomy that is consistent with the general public interest. We do not, as they did in the ancient Roman republic, and as they do now on the continent of Europe and in Latin America, emphasize centralization and make the demand for local autonomy prove its case by bearing the burden of proof. We, in this country, make the demand for centralization bear the burden of proof, and we do not surrender local autonomy until a clear case of superior public interest is made out against it in every instance. The value of local autonomy as a practice in the management of public utilities is that the public is more responsible, and, since the psychology of public utility operation has proved to be so important, it may be that the trustees of the Bay State in their proposal to give Lynn a large measure of local autonomy are wise.
